

I have changed internet providers three times when a local-based internet provider sold out to a big national carrier, and I don't want to change internet providers again. I have friends and family with "major brand" internet providers, and I am not impressed with the service the big names provide. I truly feel that the competition offered by the small, local-based internet providers are keeping the big guys on their toes. I realize that governmental entities cannot appreciate that on a corporate level as well as an individual who sees both sides of the fence, but the grass is definitely greener on my side of the ISP fence, and I beseech you to not hand over a monopoly on broadband internet service to the Bells but rather to allow the healthy competition that will only make internet service better for everybody.
